Striking Marriott workers reach agreement with hotel, union says

The 46-day strike at seven Marriott hotels in Boston is expected to end after workers vote Saturday afternoon on a tentative agreement reached Friday night between their union and the hotel chain.

The union, Unite Here Local 26, declined to release details of the agreement until the remaining 5,000 Marriott workers who are on strike in San Francisco and two locations in Hawaii settle their contracts. In all, 8,000 Marriott workers walked off the job this fall, and agreements have been reached in four other cities -- Detroit, San Jose, Oakland, and San Diego.

“Marriott did listen in the end, and they did step up and agree to a contract that is going to set a new standard for hotel workers in this city,” said Brian Lang, president of Local 26
